Apple Scald Can Be Prevented

Blacksburg - Virginia orchardists with apples scheduled to remain instorage beyond mid-December should treat the fruit with an inhibitor to protect it from apple scald.

"Apple scald is the darkening of apple skins while the fruit is in storage. It does not endanger the fruit quality. But it does strain consumer acceptance," noted George Williams, a Virginia Tech professor of horticulture.

Williams, an Extension specialist in fruits, noted, "The best coverage and scald control are obtained when the apples are treated before they are put into storage, and within one week after they have been harvested."

The scald-preventing material can be applied by any method that thoroughly covers the fruit. Incomplete coverage can result in poor scald control.

The earlier harvests of Red Delicious and Rome apple varieties are effectively protected against scald with diphenylamine (DPA) used at the rate of one to two pounds for each 100 gallons. The material can be used on all other apple varieties except Golden Delicious. Later harvests of Delicious and Rome, and all other varieties are usually well-protected by use of one pound per 100 gallons, or by ethoxyquin at the rate of three pints per 100 gallons of water.

Williams explained further, "In years when scald is severe, some scald may occur even if an inhibitor is used. Because of that possibility, growers find it wise to periodically check the stored product, especially after mid-December."

Proper, timely treatment of apples to prevent apple scald will assure growers that the fresh, natural appearance of their fruit will be maintained and that buyers will not be turned away by scald discoloration.

Recycling Turkey Hens

Blacksburg - It is economically feasible to force-molt turkey hens into a second cycle of egg production. But the flock keeper must follow recommended procedures proved in experiments at Virginia Tech and tested in field trials on commercial turkey breeder farms.

According to A.T. Leighton, Virginia Tech professor of poultry science and national figure in turkey research, "The hens will go into a second period of egg production but not without a change of feathers first."

Forcing turkeys to molt is achieved through the use of a restricted light program in a well-insulated, fan-ventilated building. If the flock is kept in an existing farm building with windows and doors, that building must be adequately darkened.

"That can be accomplished by covering the windows and other openings with builders' paper or black plastic and by filling in the cracks and crevices through which outdoor light would naturally pass.

"Forced air ventilation is essential. Diversion ducts should be attached to the air inlet and exhaust systems and painted flat black to prevent light from reflecting into the pens.

"The darker the restricted light conditions, the better will be the response of the hens when they are exposed to stimulating light levels following the restricted light period," emphasized Leighton.

The researcher explained, "A practical forced-molting procedure would consist of limiting the hens to six hours of light each day. This could be done by setting the clocks to turn the lights on at 11 a.m. and to turn them off at 5 p.m. each day.

The building can be opened for ventilation to provide the birds some relief during the hottest part of the day. But that should be only when the lights are on; and not even then, if it can be avoided," Leighton emphasized.

"Opening the building will not be necessary if insulation and ventilation are adequate," he added.

Females must be under restricted lighting for no less than 12 weeks to permit the new feather growth to be complete before they start laying again. At the end of the restricted light treatment, lights should be increased to 15 hours each day.

WHY PAY FOR ELECTRICITY YOU DO NOT USE???

Blacksburg - "Why pay for electricity you do not use?" challenged a Virginia Tech home economics Extension specialist in home furnishings while discussing lighting efficiency.

Mrs. Mildred A. Payne, also an assistant professor in the University's College of Home Economics, reminded homemakers that lighting equipment needs regular care and cleaning if it is to give you "your money's worth" in the use of power.

"A collection of dirt and dust on bulbs, tubes, diffusion globes and lampshades can cause quite a loss in light output," she noted. "This is the time of the year when there is also likely to be a noticable accumulation of insects trapped in ceiling fixtures and diffusion bowls. Why pay for light which is trapped in the fixture where it will benefit no one?"

Mrs. Payne recommended that all lighting equipment be cleaned from four to six times a year to permit it to give its most efficient performance. Portable lamps should be cleaned monthly if they are to do their best. "But make sure the power is turned off while you do it," Miss Payne cautions.

Lamp shades can be cleaned with the small dusting brush attachment on a vacuum cleaner. Silk or rayon shades that are sewed to the frame with no glued trimmings may be washed in mild, lukewarm suds and rinsed in clear water.

It is a task best done on a clear, sunny day when the shades can be dried out of doors. "Quick drying is important to prevent rusting of the shade frame," the specialist suggested.

Light bulbs can be wiped clean with a damp, soapy cloth and dried.

She who would clean ceiling fixtures is urged not to tackle the job unless there is someone to help her. Cleaning ceiling fixtures calls for extra safety precautions. Electricity must be turned off. A safe stepladder or stool is needed to stand on. Shields and bulbs must be removed, washed in warm soapy water, then dried with a lintless cloth. Exposed parts of fixtures should be dusted carefully. Then the bulbs and shields reinstalled. A helper is needed to prevent falls from the ladder or stool, and to hold the bulbs and shields as they are removed and installed.

As lamps are cleaned, darkened bulbs should be replaced. They can cause from 25 to 50 percent less light output and use about the same amount of current as would a bulb which delivers full value. Those old bulbs need not be thrown away. They can be put to use in closets and other places where full capacity is not critical.

"Fluorescent tubes with darkened ends, or which flicker should also be replaced," Miss Payne advised. "Fluorescent tubes continue to burn long after they have served their most efficient life and should be replaced before they burn out completely," she explained.

"Take good care of your lighting equipment and get your money's worth from your electric bill," Miss Payne concluded.
